The above is a portion of a fleet of Maxwell Cars used by the Motor Transport Corps of the British Army at Booyain Camp, Johannesburg, South Africa, during the recent rebellion under the rebel DeWet. This fleet played a most important part in the suppression of the rebellion, the fighting of which took place in the roughest section of South Africa under British rule. No harder work was ever attempted by pleasure cars, especially at most of the country over which they traveled was without roads. The cars carried over fourteen hundred miles the first campaign in the rebellion, carrying extra heavy loads and with the toughest possible treatment to which the picture gives more testimony. The wonderful way that the Maxwell Cars went through the entire campaign without trouble of any nature, proved their durability and power and the high praise of the Corp drivers is still the talk throughout South Africa.

There are still a number of sterling citizens whose notion of the proper place to wear evening clothes is in a photograph.

A great many men with the ability to gather it in are hopelessly inadequate when it comes to turning it loose.

SEPTEMBER MORN TATTOOED ON MAN'S BODY IS OBJECTED TO

Philadelphia, Pa., April 1.—John A. Curtin of Pittsburgh, came to this city and decided to enlist in the marines. He was a magnificent specimen physically and the recruiting officers thought they had a prize until he stripped. Then they found a sure enough "September Morn" tattooed on John and concealing him from Adam's apple to waist line.

"You can't get in the service with that thing on you," John was told. "Why not?" he demanded. "Ain't it good enough?"

"Yes; but it hasn't got any clothes on and we can't enlist men with nude figures tattooed on them."

John dressed and departed, but today he came back and sought enlistment. When he again stripped it was found that the "September Morn" was clad in a remarkable evening gown and wore a fetching hat upon her dainty head.

"I went to a tattoo artist and had it done," he said. "It hurt a whole lot, but I guess he delivered the goods all right." John was accepted.
